The vegan diet should be great for you, but a new study finds that plant-based eating plans might not have the benefits you expect — and could even be harming your health. The University of Pittsburgh’s Kimberly Matthews, a researcher who was part of the study, told us why. First, there’s the calories. The study looked at a large group of people and found that vegetarians and vegans tended to eat more calories than people who ate meat, including poultry and fish. The reason, she said, is because vegetarians and vegans tend to eat less meat and dairy than people who eat meat. On average, vegetarians and vegans eat about 1,000 calories less than meat eaters. And people who eat meat, she said, tend to eat animals with more fat and calories. So where is the meat in a “plant-based diet”? Matthews’s study looked at people who didn’t eat meat but had other types of foods in their diets. The group ate a plant-based diet but still had meat, she said. Matthews and her team used that information to come up with estimates of how much protein, fat and calories there would be in each person’s diet. That way, the researchers could compare how vegetarians and vegans — in a “diet-only” sense — ate with those who ate meat. Vegetarians and vegans also tend to eat more fruit, veggies and other foods low in calories than people who eat meat, she said, which is why vegans tend to weigh less and look healthier than meat eaters. But this pattern doesn’t always hold true, she said. Research shows that vegetarians and
