Download www.drpuidcarddesignsoftware.com of the world. The memory that they hold is of their grandkids and what they want is to care for them and teach them." The patient in our case is patient number three. The first patient was no longer a patient in need of care. The second patient, still alive, was a 75-year-old man who needed help but was able to provide for himself. The third patient, a 76-year-old woman, was the most complicated to care for. She was a bipolar woman, extremely talkative and emotionally volatile. One of the tests done on her was the Mini Mental State Examination. Her score was 20. This number is meant to give you a sense of how much the patient's cognitive functioning may be affected by her disease. It is generally considered to be on the lower end of the scale for dementia. Her mental status was also affected by the medications she was taking, therefore her score was sometimes higher and sometimes lower. Her symptoms included a great deal of anxiety, forgetfulness and a decline in her short-term memory. Her family was overwhelmed with caring for her and knew she was very sick. They were afraid that at any moment her condition could turn for the worst and they did not know how to manage her care. Her prognosis was poor. We obtained a power of attorney from the family and started doing an assessment. We found out that her memory was not affected by her disease, but that her cognition overall was diminished. She'd become disoriented. She had also developed other problems like muscle twitching, insomnia and, in the past year, an extreme decline in her appetite. Her entire world was her family. She was unable to drive, in part because of her forgetfulness, and in part because of her disorientation. She would walk into her bedroom
