Hepatocellular carcinoma (HCC) has the poorest prognosis of all common malignancies. However, the treatment for early stage HCC with curative intent has recently improved, with surgery and percutaneous ablative techniques becoming more popular. We report a single institutional analysis of the survival and cost of hepatic resection, radiofrequency ablation (RFA) and microwave ablation (MWA) in patients with early stage HCC at a large US center. From 1999 through 2008, a total of 210 patients with HCC underwent treatment with resection (n = 74), ablation (n = 64) and monitoring (n = 58). Patients were grouped by Child-Pugh Class, categorized as having early stage disease, and analyzed for disease-free survival. The median follow-up for living patients was 39 months, with a median follow-up of 16 months following ablation. Of the 74 resections, 35 (47%) were category 3 or 4 disease. The survival rate at 1, 3 and 5 years for resection was 90%, 80%, and 60%, respectively. The survival rates at 1, 3 and 5 years for patients with early stage HCC treated with hepatic resection, RFA and MWA was 87%, 84% and 72%, 76%, and 52%, 64%, respectively. The use of RFA and MWA in patients with early stage HCC was associated with comparable survival to resection. Each modality is associated with improvements in survival compared to monitoring. Therefore, hepatic resection, RFA and MWA should be considered for the treatment of early stage HCC in the context of short and long-term survival data.Obama and Clinton 3da54e8ca3
