Summary The core Internet address system (RFC3596) [RFC3596] provides mechanisms for internet hosts (and their user agents) to identify themselves and for routing decisions to be made based on host identity. Each host has a 32-bit address assigned in accordance with RFC3596. User agents use the domain name system (DNS) to resolve host identifiers into addresses. This document provides additional clarifying statements that apply to the use of IPv6 addresses for the purpose of host identity and host discovery in the core Internet addressing system. It does not affect the identification and routing capabilities of the DNS. For the purposes of this document, the term "core Internet address" refers to an Internet host's IPv6 address. It does not refer to a host's IPv4 address.
