A score for the determination of anti-tuberculosis antibiotic therapy using sputum samples. Determination of tuberculosis (TB) drug-susceptibility by using sputum samples is an important, routine method. However, its efficiency is limited by the presence of an inhibitor in the sputum samples. Our aim was to develop a new tuberculosis scoring system that incorporates smear, culture and drug-susceptibility results and that avoids the influence of inhibitors in smear, culture, or drug-susceptibility tests. A new score for determining the effectiveness of anti-tuberculosis (TB) treatment was developed using logistic regression analysis of observational data from patients with newly diagnosed active TB and a negative sputum smear and culture. The newly developed score, which combines smear, culture, and drug-susceptibility results, consists of 3 independent variables: (1) the number of sputum samples positive for acid-fast bacilli (AFB) smear microscopy, (2) the number of isolates grown on Lowenstein Jensen (LJ) medium, (3) susceptibility to all anti-TB drugs. Three groups were stratified according to the new score: (1) 0 (controls, TB treatment appropriately performed), (2) 1 to 2 (initiates, average treatment interval
