I have a requirement to communicate with a server, via an API (WCF), where the TLS layer is optional. The problem is that this API will only accept certificates which are installed on the client machine. I understand that I can use a store on the client which holds the client certificate - but this seems like a bit of a security risk and seems to defeat the point of TLS. What's the best way of dealing with this? A: The best way is to write your own API service without the need of TLS. You can still use existing.NET classes from BouncyCastle. If you are adventurous, here are some links to how this might be done: Easiest way to create self-signed SSL certificate using.NET framework
