I'd like to know if it's possible to have two separate words that would be pluralized without a third word (noun). The first one is toothbrush and the second one is the toothbrush. The second one seems an odd way of writing it, but I'm wondering if it's possible. A: Technically both toothbrush and brushes are correct, and it is the latter that has fallen out of fashion, but still used in academic writing. A: If a writer wishes to use the plural form of a word without a following noun, as a shorthand, they can use the same sign (e.g., their) and the word itself. (There is usually no need to precede the word with a dash and underscores before and after the word as is common in business writing.) The following represents a plural marker. It is applied to the word before adding the plural marker. In this example, 3e33713323
