studies have indicated that approximately 60% of all households in the United States utilize at least one fiber optic communications cable to connect individual devices to a central office node within their dwelling. Although fiber optic cable provides certain benefits, there are other costs associated with the installation and maintenance of such cable. With the ever-increasing number of cable users, the increase in the cable utilization has also increased the cost for the maintenance and service of such cable. Furthermore, many households make use of a high number of fiber optic cable pairs. This high number of cable pairs may make it difficult for a repair person to locate a specific faulty cable pair if the entire network of cable pairs has been traced.

Among the most common problems with the distribution of fiber optic cable is the breakage of the cable. For example, fiber optic cables can be broken by a malfunctioning tester for tracing a specific cable. Furthermore, the breakage of the cable may be intentional by the user to 3e33713323
