Learn more at embryogenesis abundant-like proteins in euphyllophyte seed coat: a major modulator of seed dehydration during germination. Since desiccation tolerance is a major determinant of successful seed germination, the aim of this study was to identify and characterize the late embryogenesis abundant-like proteins in the seed coats of different species, and to determine their levels in developing and fully mature seeds and after 48 h imbibition. Two different proteomic approaches were used to identify components of the seed coat's physiological plasticity-induced dehydration tolerance. The first approach was an off-line comparative proteomic analysis of seed coat desiccation tolerance. The second approach consisted of in-gel analysis of embryonin, a novel late embryogenesis abundant-like protein, which formed an insoluble complex in the seed coats and desiccated seeds of several species. Embryonin levels were found to increase two- to sevenfold (maximum level = 1.8 microg mg⁻¹ dry weight) during germination, reaching up to 11-fold (maximum = 9.2 microg mg⁻¹ dry weight) following 48 h imbibition. In contrast, levels of another late embryogenesis abundant-like protein, proline-rich protein, decreased during germination. Up to sevenfold changes in embryonin levels were detected during seed development and after 48 h imbibition, whereas proline-rich protein levels decreased by only 20%. In addition, the seed coats were found to have higher levels of embryonin and proline-rich protein when compared with their imbibing seeds. The increase in embryonin in germinating seeds and after 48 h imbibition suggests an important role in water-deficit tolerance.

MARYLAND LOTTERY RETURNS TO NORTH CAROLINA In anticipation of the all-important start of the Maryland lottery's statewide drawing on March 19, North Carolina retailers began to receive their machine preparations earlier this month, starting with four North Carolina businesses on February 8. "We received our first machine orders early this week," said B.J. Lingle, Lottery Marketing Manager. "We anticipate a huge response from retailers. Each machine comes with a $100,000 value. We remind retailers to follow all state lottery laws, rules and regulations, and to use the machines only in store, but not on weekends or holidays." In North Carolina, retailers who take part in the state lottery are subject to specific rules and regulations outlined by the N.C. Lottery Commission, including a yearly sales limit. Each Maryland retailer is permitted to place only 30 ticket orders per day, per $100,000 value. From the beginning, lottery retailers have been welcomed with open arms. Retailers have been greeted with a webpage specifically dedicated to their retail needs. Contact information for each facility and a checklist of all state lottery rules and regulations for their use of the machines were listed for ease of use for retailers. "We are honored to have been selected to offer the Maryland Lottery's in-store ticketing services," said Andy Harris, Director, Lottery Marketing for LoterCity, the service provider for the lottery. "We are excited for retailers to use the in-store sales channel to promote the Maryland Lottery. We anticipate a huge response in the next few weeks as retailers prepare to purchase their machines." Non-profit organizations, non-profit corporations, organizations, churches, city and town governments, and law enforcement agencies are all welcome to participate in the Maryland lottery, with the support of LoterCity. Organizations and businesses must pay a 3% tax of their total ticket order, with a minimum of $10,000 per ticket. Locally, the Maryland lottery has sent detailed instructions for retailers to follow, including a step-by-step guide to their operation of the ticketing machines and how to properly balance out all tickets once they are sold. A video is available from the lottery offices. "The Maryland lottery has worked tirelessly to listen to our retailers, to ensure that they have the latest information and to offer the best customer service. We are confident
