Starting May 1, 2018, the Windows 10 Anniversary Update and the Windows Update Catalog app will automatically stop checking for updates. You can choose to check for updates yourself at any time. The Windows Update catalog is a new app in Windows 10 Anniversary Update, to make it easier to find new software updates in your area. If you're not sure if your area is covered by this app, we have a guide on where to download the Windows Update catalog. When you download a new update package, the catalog will read which updates are marked critical, recommended or optional, and make this information visible in the app to help you find which updates to install first. When you click on optional updates, it will install the updates in a specific order. This order is based on the relative risks of installing a given update, and we will try to install an update in a new order every time you launch the Windows Update Catalog app. At some point, you may come across an update that has been superseded. We will automatically decline to install this update, but you can optionally install it if you'd like to. Why Do Updates Install Automatically? The Windows Update process installs Windows updates for two reasons. Firstly, the security model of Windows updates is important to protect your PC against security vulnerabilities. Windows update is meant to be an automatic process that we run regularly as part of system maintenance. Secondly, Windows Update is also designed to continue to work with minimal impact to other software on your computer. Installation of updates is usually quick, and leaving your system running with only the new apps or files is one of the ways we make it easier for you to use Windows 10. When to Check for Updates Yourself The Windows Update service runs periodically in the background of your computer, checking for updates and installing them automatically. There are times though when it is beneficial to check for updates yourself. When you notice that updates aren't appearing in the Windows Update dialog, or that you have Unifory ebooks free download for mac Turkish Turkish (Turkish: Türkçe, 'tɛɾɨkçə; Turkish language: Türk Dilini) is a Turkic language belonging to the East Turkic language family, spoken natively by over 55 million people primarily in Turkey, Azerbaijan, Bulgaria, Georgia, Iran, Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan, Romania, Russia, Tajikistan, Ukraine, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan and Kazakhstan. It is the third-most widely spoken language in Europe. The Turkish language has official script, a Latin-based alphabet derived from the Ottoman script, the Latin alphabet, and a Cyrillic alphabet. It is also written in Middle Persian and several other varieties of the Persian language. The language is standardised under the terms of the Turkish Language Agreement of 1983. The date of the first recorded use of a written language in Anatolia is generally given as c. 2500 BCE. The first grammatical texts are dated to the Roman Empire. Turkish was the first Turkic language to develop a written standard and to evolve as a literary language with significant influence on the cultures in the areas where it has been spoken since the Classical era, and an official status as a literary language in Turkey since 1924. It is estimated to be either the third or fourth most widely spoken language in the world and the only language located within the Turkic family of languages. It is either the national or official language of Turkey, Turkey's Republic of Northern Cyprus, Turkey's Republic of Western Armenia, and the Republic of Northern Iraq, as well as Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan and Pakistan, where it is one of the three official languages, alongside Russian and Persian.
