He has zero NBA experience, and if you look at his stats compared to some of the other top prospects in the draft, it's easy to see why. Hancock was a good college player in good programs. He put up mediocre numbers. There are reasons to believe he could be a decent backup point guard, but the odds of him being a starter are pretty low. He can't jump, and his shooting touch, which once was very good, now seems to be limited. Only a lack of talent will keep him in the NBA. While John Calipari's only son is no longer eligible for the NBA draft, the younger Calipari is still in touch with the program from which he'll never be cut. He committed to Kentucky last September and received scholarship money shortly thereafter. When the draft was announced, he committed to Kentucky again on April 5, 2016. He received scholarship money again on June 2, 2016. He committed to Louisville on August 22, 2016, and received scholarship money on January 3, 2017. He committed to play for the Cards again on April 3, 2017, after Calipari accepted the head coaching position at Texas. He received scholarship money again on May 23, 2017. What those commitments have in common is that the scholarship money used to fund their pays $3,035 per year and covers six months of housing. When committed, his total payout was $3,035. And Calipari used an NCAA rule change to keep
