[The dynamics of ultraviolet radiation sources in Arctic]. Seasonal changes of solar radiation in the Arctic over oceans and continental territories with different latitude are analyzed. For this purpose, the method of Kalman filtering was used. The moment of passage of high-intensity solar radiation waves through the stratosphere and their lower troposphere (0.2-0.8 microm) is calculated. It is shown that during the strong decrease of sunlight at latitudes of 40 degrees N to 80 degrees N, the waves firstly pass through the stratosphere. The lowest moment of passage in the atmosphere is observed at latitudes of 40 degrees N to 70 degrees N. At all latitudes there is an insignificant increase in the intensity of radiation reaching from the troposphere to the surface.

Extensive research on utilizing wheat straw for bioethanol production has resulted in a huge volume of data. Although it holds great potential to replace corn as a substitute, for biofuels, the recalcitrant nature of plant cell wall leads to the production of large quantities of a difficult to treat by-product known as Wheat Straw's Nanocellulose Fraction (WSNF). In this study, the WSNF, was hydrolyzed by microwave heated NaOH solution followed by fungal cellulase enzyme to investigate its potential for sugar conversion. Results showed that NaOH pretreatment could enhance sac
