Such mechanisms include one or more magnetic surfaces that are adapted to contact the inner wall of the pipe when the mechanism is in place. In order to retain the mechanism in place, the mechanism is provided with one or more suitable retaining structures for engaging with the pipe wall. For example, the pipe typically has a number of circumferential projections on its inner wall that engage with one or more retaining structures on the inside of the body of the mechanism. The retaining structures are generally formed by molding together a magnetic material and a plastics material, so that the resulting parts have a plastic retaining portion that protrudes radially outward from the magnetic material. The radially protruding plastic portion of the retaining structure has a greater width than the width of the remainder of the retaining structure. In addition, the plastic retaining portion typically has a greater thickness than the remainder of the retaining structure so that the plastic material of the retaining portion has a greater rigidity than the remainder of the retaining structure. Such magnetic drain closing mechanisms are well known and widely used. As a result of their wide use, it is to be understood that the mechanisms are not considered to be the most innovative structures. In modern plumbing applications, it has become commonplace for a user to install a number of these retaining structures on a water drainage pipe at installation time. This typically involves mounting a number of magnetic drain closing mechanisms on the pipe. For example, in a typical washing machine installation, it is typical for a single washing machine to have eight such drain closing mechanisms. When an old wash machine is removed and replaced with a new washing machine, the user is often required to remove and mount all eight mechanisms. As is readily apparent, this is a time consuming and tedious process, particularly if the user does not use drain closing mechanisms
