(AP) – Fracking for natural gas beneath Massachusetts is now set to expand on land leased to Cabot Oil and Gas Corp. In a decision expected later this week, the state’s highest court will weigh whether the gas companies are legally prohibited from drilling into the Marcellus shale and the state’s public trust doctrine prevents it. At issue is whether the state’s leasing system, designed to protect public trust resources, prohibits the companies from interfering with these resources once leased. Fracking requires blasting a rock formation thousands of feet below the surface with water, sand and chemicals that force natural gas and other substances from the rock. The technique was approved in the late 1980s and exploded in popularity after the recession fueled demand for natural gas. The process is now widespread in Pennsylvania, Indiana and Texas. Another hurdle to getting rid of Massachusetts’ so-called “Shale Spill Law” that took effect in 2015 was the chance it could open the door to fracking in the state’s most sensitive areas. Gov. Charlie Baker’s administration has said the law was designed to protect state-owned waters and public land, including areas where fracking is prohibited because they are deemed to be under the public trust. Cabot has been fighting the law since it took effect. “We believe the law is valid and we’re prepared to litigate the case to defend it,” spokesman Chase Carey said. “We’re hopeful that we’ll ultimately prevail in court.” The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court heard arguments in January, but the justices are not scheduled to issue a ruling until later this week. The Marcellus includes large portions of Pennsylvania and parts of New York. State conservation official Jordan Kaplan told lawmakers during a hearing last month that fracking has been “very, very mild” in Massachusetts and would only occur on private land. But he added his office was prepared to take action if drillers attempt to drill beneath state lands. “The worst thing we can do is not recognize this opportunity,” said state Rep. John Barrett, a Democrat from Franklin, which lies close to the Marcellus. “We’
