The space agency announced on Thursday that it had found debris that could be related to the space shuttle Challenger. The debris, which was discovered by scientists who are working at the Kennedy Space Center in Florida, could have been torn away from the Challenger by a chunk of a debris that was onboard when the space shuttle disintegrated 73 seconds after launch, killing the seven astronauts on board. But the space agency's analysis of the debris, which was found in an unopened box inside a special building at the space center, is not definitive. The Challenger broke apart on Jan. 28, 1986, 73 seconds after it left the launch pad at the Kennedy Space Center for a mission to the Manned Spacecraft Center in Houston. The crew's mission was to test a new parachute. The shuttle broke apart because the leading edge of the shuttle's solid rocket booster, known as the external tank, exploded. NASA has not released much information about what happened to the Challenger debris. In 1986, after the disaster, NASA's director of flight crew operations, Bob Overmyer, said that in the days after the crash he was told that the space shuttle had broken apart. But he declined to elaborate, saying he was sworn to secrecy.Last news Dignity USA is a ministry of Desiring God, a ministry of Bethany Christian Fellowship, a national non-profit organization.Jon Kolko, CE, FAFC, CFGC, CLCE, FCCA, CSE, CEM, DDD, DET, DRDC, FRCI, MCC, CAP, MSCC, SDRN, EDMN, ARCP, not only am I honored by the invitation, but pleased to be..
