Java's Problems - daschaefer ===== sp332 The main issue with Java is the JVM. You need a Java program to run on the JVM, so it's not as portable as an interpreted language. Also, because of many, many classes and libraries that are needed to "do stuff", the language itself is quite large. And java has a bad reputation as a language. ----- crazydoggers I think a lot of people are not thinking hard enough about the fact that Java is still very much alive. I know a lot of people who have been using it in bigger and bigger projects lately. Not to mention the zillions of companies around the world using Java for everything from a very simple kiosk app to a massive banking system. There are even JVM languages that look way better than Java (Scala, anyone?). There are even JVM languages than are significantly faster than Java (Clojure, Scala). There are even JVM languages that can take advantage of all the neat stuff the JVM has to offer (Scala, Clojure). All this points out that Java is far from dead, which makes it a pretty sensible technology to try out.

Q: JQuery constructor: pre, post, or both? I am currently building a mobile application in HTML5, CSS3 and jQuery. Is the better way to instantiate a new object with class methods that would be called after my initialization functions has occurred, to initialize the class and then attach the constructor functions to the prototype? Or should I initiate the initializing function followed by the constructor function and then initialize the objects? Which of the following is the right way? Or should I use both? Instead of going below and using the following instead, I simply build a simple version of my class on jsfiddle. Thanks for help! function Player(){ }

Player.prototype.nextSection=function(){ console.log('next section'); } Player.prototype.currentSection=function(){ console.log(this.currentSection.id); } with the following on jsfiddle var player= new Player(); A: If you want to control the loading of the various methods of the object, or making sure it is only loaded into one point of a single page's life-cycle, you might want to use one of these directives: jQuery.deferred jQuery.promise Angular service There you can have a piece of code that is only run when the object has been created.
