Basic browser layout Figure 4-10 shows the basic browser layout — the window for browsing the web. (The rounded corners of the image signify that the browser is in `_desktop_` mode, with the Web sites and web pages.) You can resize the browser window by dragging its corners. The window has a standard navigation bar at the top, which contains the menu bar (refer to Figure 4-9). In the center of the browser is the address/search bar, as you can see. (I'll give you the details on what the page address is and how to navigate the browser later in this chapter.) FIGURE 4-10: The web browser displays a preview of the web page. At the bottom of the browser, you can access toolbars for viewing and editing the page. The tabs on the left side of the toolbar enable you to navigate to the other pages that are open in the browser at any time.

Q: Why 'noun' keyword in C# is in red? Possible Duplicate: How to correctly use noun-noun relationships? I'm trying to learn the C# and I've started the book Visual C# 2008. I've read the first chapter - inheritance and they use the following code. `Class banana { void eat(food f) { //... } void go() { //... } } Class food { void eat(banana b) { b.eat(this); } }` This code compile successfully. But my IDE shows the keyword food in red and the method signature (method. But in the book the author hasn't shown the red. Why is that? A: That's one of many IDE "intelligent coloring" features. It's not required to add colors to the names of members, for instance. The author does not show those colors because he probably didn't want to confuse you unnecessarily. If you find red coloring to be useful or to help you read his text, you can configure your IDE so that it displays that coloring. You can do so for example under Tools > Options > Text Editor > C# > Formatting > Code Style.

This invention relates to the field of forming nonwoven fabric webs and particularly to aqueous fabric forming systems which are capable of producing nonwoven fabric webs having high tensile strength and absorbency. Nonwoven fabric webs are used in a variety of applications. For example, they are used as liner fabrics for trash bags and wet wipes and as wipes themselves. The construction of such fabrics can be done on the spot by a consumer at home or by businesses producing the nonwoven fabrics for commercial sale. These nonwoven fabric webs can be formed by a variety of processes. In one method, for example, individual fibers are deposited from a slurry in an air laid process. Other nonwoven forming processes include meltblown processes and spunbonding processes. Nonwoven fabrics can be produced in a variety of different constructions. For example, nonwovens are available for disposable products such as wet wipes and dry wipes. Nonwovens are also available for use as liners for trash bags and in industrial applications such as clothing apparel and ductile industrial wraps. In these latter areas, the nonwovens are required to have sufficient wet strength and ductility to handle the stresses associated with the particular applications in which they are used. In wet wipe applications, for example, the fabric has to remain intact and maintain its integrity when the wet wipes are wetted by an aqueous solution. In this regard, it has been found that nonwoven fabrics, based on aqueous phase spunbonded webs, are useful wet wipes. Although wet wipes are generally made of soft nonwoven fabrics, the wet strength is generally insufficient to handle stresses during use. The wet strength of nonwoven fabrics can be improved through the addition of wet strength fibers. These fibers however tend to reduce the sheet forming efficiency of nonwoven webs and increase the manufacturing cost. Such wet strength nonwoven fabrics tend to have lower tensile strength and absorbency. It has been suggested in U.S. Pat. No. 4,661,205 to Yarnall et al. that absorbency can be improved in nonwovens by adding combinations of hydrophilic polymers and hydrophobic polymers to make superabsorbent fibers. When such hydrophobic and hydrophilic fibers are combined to form a nonwoven fabric, the resulting nonwoven fabric tends to have lower tensile strength and higher absorbency due to the presence of the hydrophilic component.
