Polarization interferometry for characterization of PAA coatings on optical substrates. Polarization interferometry, an optical technique for the measurement of birefringence and/or thickness of transparent polymeric films, is described. A comparison of the methods of common and polarization interferometry for the measurement of coatings formed by the polymer poly(acrylic acid) on glass substrates is presented. It is found that, for a given optical substrate, a coated film is better characterized by polarization interferometry than by common interferometry. The polarization interferometry method is improved by considering the state of polarization of light interacting with a coating. A theoretical investigation is performed in order to describe the results observed.
