The radial force which acts on the surface membrane in a reentrant cardiac cell, in the initial phase of reentry, has been computed from the mechanics of deformation of the membrane near the boundary of the core. The model employed is an elastic membrane attached to the myocardial surface at a fixed distance r(0). The distance r(0) was varied to give a maximum radial force. The model was then extended to include an elastic interior membrane with mechanical coupling with the interior of the cell. The results indicated that the maximum radial force decreases exponentially with increase of reentry rate. This is explained by the fact that as the reentry frequency is increased the core is pushed out away from the axis of the cell. This increases the contact surface area with a corresponding increase in the effective surface tension. This results in a maximum of the effective radial force.Q: Why is media/sounds not working for my iOS phone app?
