This was because people of similar social class or education were living together and typically local area where they lived was densely populated. Social capital was a network of mutual obligations and behaviours that built a sense of community and connection between people. The term is often used to describe the capacity of individuals and groups of people to work together to meet common goals, participate in civic activities and trust and respect local communities. Social capital is an important determinant of the health of communities. Social Capital in ED {#s1} ===== Every day, Emergency Departments (EDs) see an increasing number of patients with mental illness who have high levels of social capital. Many patients often turn to EDs as a primary location for health care. Some even initiate violent episodes in EDs. If EDs have the capacity to prevent such negative outcomes, then it becomes a primary destination for community-based mental health services. The importance of social capital is well-documented in the literature on mental health. Research suggests that social capital, particularly the social interaction between community members, improves an individual's well-being and reduces the chance of developing mental illness. Strengthening community networks in deprived areas tends to improve mental health outcomes[ @R9] and are beneficial for people with mental illness. In addition, community organisations such as church groups, land trusts, anti-homelessness organisations and community centres are also able to improve mental health outcomes for residents.[ @R8] Mental illness not only leads to poorer social outcomes for patients but also impacts negatively on communities where such people live. There is increasing evidence that in disadvantaged areas, violence and aggression is higher.[ @R15] In addition, many areas have more instances of substance misuse and other social problems.[ @R19] In such areas, rates of hospitalisation for mental illness are high. Importantly, people with mental illness are more likely to die in the streets than in EDs.[ @R16] Moreover, violent crimes are often underreported[ @R21] and the low rates of convictions contribute to the high rate of reoffending among such patients.
