As so much new information is being generated by these sources, so in the face of so many alternative, technically valid histories, the government has no choice but to deal with each one individually. In fact, the absence of a distinct government line on this issue can be interpreted not as incompetence but rather as a deliberate attempt to prevent the emergence of a clear policy on the matter before the election. The world is a vastly complicated place. The authors argue that the concept of a 'science based government' is based on a false premise. In recent years two fields have evolved which may provide answers to these questions. New sources of information have become available in the areas of archaeology and geology, and have provided new data and hypotheses which can now be tested against the existing evidence. This article provides a discussion of the issues involved, a review of the original data, a discussion of the major hypotheses, and a synthesis of new knowledge. Neither the government nor the fossil-fuel industry has proposed an alternative solution to carbon dioxide. Scientists, policy-makers, and the public, have all become aware of the importance of accurately estimating carbon emissions and the concentrations of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere. In 1997, for example, the US Congress set up the Committee on the Assessment of Greenhouse Gas Endangerment. In January 2000, the National Research Council of the National Academy of Sciences produced a report entitled The Effects of Carbon Dioxide, Climate, and Oceans: A Scientific Assessment, the results of which were published in October 2000. It is also a fact that the fossil-fuel industry cannot be prevented from operating. In fact, the government has already sold virtually all of the oil reserves in the US. Neither does the government have the resources to make major investments in alternative energy technologies. In fact, it appears that the UK government, unlike many governments elsewhere, has already committed its wealth to the removal of greenhouse gases from the atmosphere. For the consumer, the question is therefore whether it is possible for a consumer to do much about carbon dioxide. The specific question of whether people should be given a choice as to whether their house should burn gas or electricity cannot be answered until the new energy arrangements come into operation. It is for these reasons that it is important to establish which factors are important in the long-term and which are important in the short term. As in the UK, e79caf774b
