Kidney stones are a common affliction, and of the various types, kidney stones of the renal pelvis are particularly difficult to dissolve. Ureteral stones tend to migrate through the ureter to the bladder where they produce intense irritation and inflammation. While most ureteral stones are successfully treated by dissolution, some in extreme cases develop an abscess of the bladder. In the past, surgical procedures have been used to remove kidney stones, but these are in most cases undesirable, particularly in the case of renal stones. In treating kidney stones of the renal pelvis, a percutaneous technique has been successfully used. A ureteral catheter is guided into the lower calix by antegrade insertion through the ureter and the stone is then fragmented by a laser. In most kidney stone procedures, the body is substantially waterlogged, and irrigation fluid is used to carry away the fragmented stone. This interferes with the surgical technique. If the body is anesthetized to avoid the effects of pain, it is difficult or impossible to detect whether or not the irrigation is successful. If body fluids are obtained from the patient to monitor for the presence of the fragmented stone, there is a possibility that the body fluids will become contaminated by the fragmented stone. This is a particular problem with lithotripsy since a contaminant stone may cause additional irritation of the upper urinary tract, which in turn may precipitate infection of the kidney. It has been found that a sonic pulse produced between about 1 MHz and about 1.2 MHz has the effect of highly energizing a body fluid to a temperature that is about twice that of pure, unenergized water. By propagating a beam of such sonic energy into the body fluid, it has been possible to fragment calculus.Role of nitric oxide in acute hypotensive effects of hypercapnia in pithed rats.
