Vero E6 cells derived from platypus (Ornithorhynchus anatinus) eggs were propagated in cell culture for 3 years. We examined the effect of geographical areas on the growth of the cell lines and the establishment of new cell lines on different batches of cells. On the third passage, the growth rates of these cells were estimated in test medium containing various additives. The factor XIX-protease inhibitor (Ph) had a stimulatory effect on the growth of the cells. Replacement of the test medium with 2% bovine serum albumin (BSA) supported the growth of these cells. Addition of 1 mM glutamine was essential to the growth of these cells. The growth rates of these cells were much greater in the central region of Australia than in the northern and southern regions. The establishment of new cell lines from southern platypus eggs had a long period, requiring more than 1 year. The establishment of new cell lines from northern eggs required only 1 week. We suggest that the optimal growth medium for the platypus cell line is 2% BSA in Ham's F12 medium containing 1 mM glutamine. It is possible to establish new cell lines from platypus eggs using cells from different batches of cell culture, provided that the test medium for the new cell line is 10 times diluted from the optimized medium.
