The relevance of small hydroelectric power in the rural areas of developing countries. The contribution of small hydroelectric power (HEP) to energy supply in developing countries is less appreciated than it should be. The reasons for this are multifold:

- (i) there is a tendency to rely on large HEP for electricity production;
- (ii) the energy sector is often a low priority for governments;
- (iii) the standard indicators of HEP are not generally used or are not adapted to the low-yield low-head HEP plants available in rural areas;
- (iv) and the needs for energy, especially in rural areas, are not well understood.

We address the value of small HEP for rural electrification in a developing country. We then focus on the application of the standard indicators of HEP to understanding the relevant aspects of small HEP for rural areas. Finally, we discuss the options for improving the utility
