Significantly, Nintendo's HyperMotion Technology is not the first to attempt the feat of accurately rendering a real-life football match in motion in video games. That title belongs to Konami, whose Football Superstars (1993) and Perfect Pace (1995) add a 2D component to the 3D footwork of player models. However, neither previous iteration of the technology is able to capture the intense motion of players from a real football game. And this new Nintendo-developed technology will not only reflect the movement of players accurately on the pitch, but it will do so when they collide with an opponent and their impact is felt with real-world sensations. "When we began developing FIFA 22, we thought deeply about what it is like to play the real-world game," said Toby Irestedt, senior producer on the game at developer EA Canada. "We set out to capture a series of nuanced movements, from the manner in which players form a wall, change positions, communicate with teammates, and even shake hands with opponents. The result of this work is the world's first game to capture the nuanced and realistic movement of players so perfectly, and then relay these movements in each footballing scenario with a stunning sense of physical realism." Irestedt went on to say that players feel every contact, tackle and shove, and the physics fidelity is not just very specific to FIFA 22, but it also compliments every other aspect of the game. "The technology is also capturing a lot of player interactions and help us to build the flow of action and build a more immersive gameplay experience," Irestedt added. The Accurate Movement of Players on the Pitch The process of capturing footballing action in FIFA 22 began many years ago with a player's unique body shape and the way the players move as they play. A full body camera system was developed by the team and it has captured every gesture and move. The data collected is then compiled into a 3D model from which the player behaviors that form their performance can be recreated. This process, which involved a motion capture suit used for almost a year, is the only one in the world that can capture the movements of a real player in such detail. "The motion capture data is captured with as little external interference as possible and it's used to show us the most natural movements for each player," said Bérénice Spina
