The results of an anatomical and laboratory study of 12 cases of anorexia nervosa, a group having a history of excessive self-induced vomiting to compensate for food refusal, are presented. Histological examination revealed marked hyperemia and large areas of infarction of the mucosal lining of the gastric antrum and corpus; changes were in the antrum rather than the corpus. Reduced pepsin activity was found in the mucosa of the corpus. No differences were found in pH, titratable acidity, or gastric secretory volume. In two of the 12 subjects (patients 3 and 4), intra-gastric injection of 100 cc of 0.33 M HCl caused acute bleeding. The results of a follow-up clinical study of a group of 24 control subjects and 22 patients with anorexia nervosa are also presented. These included evaluation of gastric pathology and, in the latter, measurement of gastric acid secretion and gastric secretory volume. The latter demonstrated a significant increase in gastric secretory volume in the group of subjects with anorexia nervosa. No other significant differences were found between the two groups.
