More security things One of the major drawbacks of Windows OS is the absence of a proper group management, which leads to all user accounts being present on the same group. In addition,

Windows group management is not based on Samba directories. So, if you are a member of the local Administrators group, you cannot see network shares and printers. You can add users to groups by using the `grup` command, but it is a bit slow. An alternative solution is to use Group Policy to assign the user to a specific group. If you are in need of a

One of the most convenient “Linux su” equivalent on Windows operating systems that provide run commands with elevated permissions as well as elevate the current shell console window. To access this app, enter `gsudo -h` or `gsudo -?` from the command-line and press enter. This will give you the following description: Allows you to run elevated scripts One of the most convenient “Linux su” equivalent on Windows operating systems that provide run commands with elevated permissions as well as elevate the current shell console window. To access this app, enter `gsudo -h` or `gsudo -?` from the command-line and press enter. This will give you the following description: Tested and reliable tool, fully featured. While a couple of the features to access this utility are not documented, they are as follows: The utility provides access to the recent process list: `gsudo ls` Allows the user to store credentials and use it without have to re-enter them each time: `gsudo persist` Allows the user to open new terminal windows, even when the old one remains open Allows the user to open new terminal windows, even when the old one remains open Allows access to the bootstrap console scripts, optionally through opening a new window every time Allows the user to run apps in elevated privileges while retaining the user credentials from the current shell console window While there is no sudo command in Windows per se, the closest thing to it is “run as administrator”. Even so, running processes or programs via an Administrator account does not come with elevated privileges. In fact, even though the account credentials may have administrator permissions, the processes under this do not, unless they are elevated. This is where tools like `gsudo` comes in, a simple CLI utility that allows you to run apps with elevated rights without spawning a new console host window. As the name suggests, the idea behind the tool is to provide a Linux `sudo` equivalent on Windows operating systems that provide run commands with elevated permissions as well as elevate the current shell console window. Allows you to run elevated scripts According to the developer, the commands are displayed in the current user-level console window by default. In the eventuality that a new cli is required with elevated privileges, then you need to use `-n` command to open the new window. In addition, the utility can be used in conjunction with scripts that need elevated access. In the eventuality that you want to

What's New In?

A simple command line tool that allows you to easily run programs with elevated rights using Linux-style commands in the current user-level console Requires Microsoft Windows and .NET Framework There are tons of Android apps for desktop browsers. But what if you have a desktop browser that has full

HTML5 capabilities but you don't want to install another web browser just for that. That's where the first desktop web browser for the HTPC comes in: StarStream. StarStream is a versatile web browser that not only uses other apps' resources as the basis for a new web browser, but also adds some Android-style features. I should probably also mention that the app is fully open source, so you can even take a look under the hood and see how it works. The interface is clean, yet still fully customizable with home screen widgets, available app shortcuts to your favorites and more. You can set the home screen page to show your web browser or turn off the home screen altogether. There are also notifications for common events, such as weather, battery and time and sound indicators when an app uses data.

StarStream is also a Chrome app. So it loads apps, but also web pages and documents from other apps. It even supports more than just Chrome extensions. If you're looking for a full-blown web browser that you can use to watch YouTube, stream Netflix or browse the web, StarStream is a good one.
