Latex products have been implicated in the development of hypersensitivity symptoms in a wide variety of settings including during preimplantation diagnosis, the surgical repair of incisional hernia, and airway surgery. Latex allergy is diagnosed by the demonstration of sensitization to latex (through serologic testing) and the demonstration of a relevant hypersensitivity reaction following latex exposure. The diagnosis of latex allergy can be made by excluding a known or suspected nonallergic source of latex exposure or by using double-blind placebo-controlled latex provocation testing. When latex allergy is present, removal of latex is not the recommended treatment.Q: How do I use classes in C++? I am writing a c++ class for my university project. I want to make the class a friend of the main program in order to access its member variables and methods. What is the best way to do this? Do I need to make the class a friend of the class I am trying to access? A: Most of the time, you shouldn't need to make your class friends with whatever it is you are trying to access. If you want to make it friends, then you can either make it a friend of the class you want access to or you can have it inherit from a class that is friends with the class you want access to. The difference between the two is that the former allows direct access to all the members of the friend class (public members only), while the latter encapsulates the members of the friend class, and the methods of the friend class in to a class which is friends with the access class. As a rule of thumb, don't make your class friends with anything you don't want to directly access. Finite element analysis of a finite endoscopic instruments in a deep transgastric minilaparotomy. In this paper we investigate the biomechanics of a finite endoscopic instruments and a resectoscope/endoscopic stapler in a deep transgastric minilaparotomy using a finite element method. To generate forces generated by tissue manipulation, we use the geometry of the robot arms at six positions at 5 degrees increments in orientation for both the endoscopic instruments and the resectoscope/endoscopic

Craniofacial morphogenesis requires temporal control of regulatory gene networks; however, the molecular control mechanisms responsible remain largely unknown. The smooth muscle transcription factor gene SMAD6 is a key early regulatory gene that is activated during chondrogenesis in the mouse embryo and critical for proper anterior-posterior axis formation. In our previous work, we showed that the Hox proteins are key to downstream activation of SMAD6, via its proposed co-factors. Interestingly, we also found that mutant SMAD6 expression in the anterior neural plate causes a dramatic restriction of Hox gene expression in the midbrain, suggesting that SMAD6 is a regulator of Hox expression in the head. The experiments proposed here are designed to explore the regulation of SMAD6 expression by Hox proteins, and test the hypothesis that SMAD6 is a key regulatory gene responsible for this process. In Aim 1, we will use a bioinformatic approach to identify conserved sequences in the SMAD6 and Hox gene promoters to define the SMAD6 response elements. We will use chromatin-immunoprecipitation to assay for the binding of SMAD6 to candidate SMAD6 elements, and assess its ability to activate
