Q: Node.js Socket.io and SSL Is there any difference between having an SSL certificate with an internal ip (vs say www.xxx.com) for node.js server side and having the same SSL certificate as the server for the front end (passport.js, etc...)? Would there be any problems with the two nodes (as in if node.js relies on a particular ip to bind to)? A: There is no problem running a socket server on a non-external IP. On the other hand, if you are planning to connect your socket server with another server it will not help because the connecting server's IP address will be external to your server. You would need a public IP. If you are using a self-signed certificate, it is assumed that both parties will have the same private key and use the same certificate to trust each other. This invention relates to a papermaker's clothing. More particularly, it relates to the clothing which covers the framework or core of a paper machine. During a paper making process, a considerable amount of water is used. Thus, when the paper web is dried the still moist, relatively heavy web of paper runs through a large number of rollers in order to dry. Accordingly, the surface of paper machine clothing is frequently wetted. Unfortunately, as the paper machine clothing ages and is used in this wet condition, it becomes relatively threadbare and weak. Moreover, as the paper machine clothing is used, the paper making process wears the fabric making it weaker and causing puffs, holes and the like, which limit its life. One attempt to increase the life of the machine clothing has been the use of relatively short fibers and relatively small pores. The general trend, however, has been to make the fabric as resilient as possible. During a drying step, a paper web is passed over a heat exchange surface. This surface may comprise a series of stationary tubes or a series of rotating cylinders, through which air is directed, so that heat is applied to the web in such a manner as to drive the water from the web. The web is then dried by passing it over rolls. After the paper web has been dried, it passes over a cooling roll. This roll is generally one of many rolls which comprise the lower run of the paper machine. The web is then generally passed over a series of rolls which are used to squeeze the web. This squeezing process is used to remove
