A: The error is being returned due to an inconsistency in the data structure used to reference license agreements. This was done to save memory on the CD but not on hard disk, meaning the license agreement is lost when the CD is removed. An inconsistent file systems is quite common for this situation. The scenario in the question is very common if a CD is installed on the player, then replaced by a USB flash drive and then put back in the slot. Restoring from that inconsistency is not possible. The answer is to ensure the license agreement file is at the same path on the CD and the server. What this does not cover is the need to set the DLC data and CD related settings correctly in FSX and FS2004. The consistency of these settings will eliminate the problem you are having. To do this, connect the CD and hard disk to the same machine, go to FSX and configure the settings in CD and hard disk correctly for FSX. Then go to FS2004 and configure these settings for FS2004, or switch to FS2004 to configure both CD and hard disk for FS2004. Q: .NET HttpClient vs Google gcloud Python SDK I am trying to use the Google Cloud Python SDK to make requests to a Google Sheet, and am having difficulty understanding the library. For example, I am using the following code to try to get the contents of the cell in a given Google Sheet, from google.cloud import storage from google.cloud.storage import Client client = storage.Client() drive = client.service('drive') sheets = drive.service('sheets') def get cell(sheet, cell): try: cell = sheet.get all cells(cell id=cell) return cell[0][0] except IndexError: return None The documentation states that cell[0] returns a row object, but is then unclear about what I should do with the row objects returned. Here is what I have so far (stripped down to the core actions) cell = sheet.get_all_cells(cell_id=cell) return cell Would this be a more appropriate solution? What should I do with cell[0]?
