A common approach to this problem is to use a graph (typically, a 2-dimensional layout of roads) to represent where a vehicle has been previously observed (i.e., its "nearest neighbor"). A known approach in this vein is to use a dendogram to represent the locations (ordered by time) at which the vehicle was observed. A common extension of this graph-based approach is the use of Google Earth maps for the road network. Motivation for template methods reduce the amount of data stored by the system which would otherwise need to represent every vehicle which has been observed, and also improve the time efficiency of finding the nearest reference vehicle location. Overview Often a tracking application is allowed to maintain a "fuzzy" array of location for a vehicle. This list of locations is maintained in real time, and updated whenever the vehicle moves. For example, if the vehicle were allowed to move freely within a 50-mile radius of a certain point, it would be allowed to store a location once every 300 ms. The locations at which the vehicle has been observed using a graph, such as a dendogram or a tree. The user or a server maintains a record of all the locations at which the vehicle has been observed. Fuzzy locations are an approximation of where the vehicle is located. For example, for a vehicle which is observed point. A latitude and a longitude within 10 degrees of the observed point. A leading for the South Pole), a longitude (for the South Pole) and a clock angle (pointing roughly in the same direction as the vehicle).
