Non-destructive editing Adobe provides a single interface for creating and editing images. The powerful features and extensive customization options available in Photoshop make it the leading-edge software for digital photography editing. However, the interface is designed with an aggressive style that forces users to cut, paste, and delete images as though they were on a real-time desktop. In some ways, this is like using a knife to slice a cookie. To solve this problem, Adobe launched its newest imaging program, Adobe Photoshop Lightroom, in 2009. It is built on the same structure as Photoshop, but instead of being "destructive" — meaning that it overwrites or alters the original image data — the editor simply updates the image and discards the older files. This "non-destructive" work environment is much more user-friendly because you can simply work your way through your photos in an editing session. Lightroom is great for any number of tasks, but its primary function is to serve as a catalog for your entire image library. It allows you to store all your image files, manage them, and search for a specific image with one click. It doesn't have any editing tools, but it is the best all-purpose image-sharing application in the digital realm. ## Image Editing: Manipulating Depth, Exposure, and Clarity Photoshop's combination of powerful tools and intuitive interface can enable you to quickly manipulate the luminance, color, and contrast of any image. Photoshop has many features dedicated to creating or editing deep, shallow, mid-toned, hard, soft, low contrast, high contrast, and extreme contrast images. Most of these features are available in the standard edit section of the interface. In addition to the standard tools in the edit mode, Photoshop offers specific features that are useful for creating photographic images. The following section explores Photoshop's primary features for manipulating these image types. You can use the menus to open each category directly.

The Food and Drug Administration, on Jan. 15, 2020, proposed a ban on the most widely used nicotine e-cigarette product in the United States. While some states and some employers have approved their use, it will now be prohibited for all but a few situations. The FDA based its action on the Surgeon General's advisory committee. The advisory committee, issued in December 2018, reported that the electronic nicotine delivery products (ENDS) may pose a number of health risks to youth, including the possibility of addiction, as well as problems with ENDS' battery power, product usage, component quality, manufacturing practices, and the vaping device market. The committee also reported that the low emission of toxic chemicals in e-cigarettes was a critical consideration in this approval process. The restriction will not apply to other nicotine products or to these companies' other products, which are not covered by this policy. The proposed policy was based on a review of the organization's literature and data. FDA's proposed policy does not ban e-cigarettes, but it does recommend that they be kept away from children and adolescents, that they be used only in locations where traditional cigarettes are prohibited, and that they be sold only in stores that are fully compliant with their state of residence and all applicable federal laws. The proposed policy also limits sales of these products to adults who will be legally eligible to buy tobacco products under these laws. When deciding how to set the policy, FDA had to consider multiple important questions, including: 1) the risks and benefits of these products; 2) the benefits that these products may provide for adult smokers who use them to quit, stop, or cut down on their tobacco consumption; 3) whether the products are consumer-acceptable and user-friendly; 4) the dangers of e-cigarettes, particularly those that contain nicotine; and 5) public health and public safety issues, such as whether these products could be used to "divert" kids away from cigarette smoking. Finally, as always, FDA also evaluated the need for the proposed action. The proposed policy serves the protection of the public's health by addressing the risks posed by the use of ENDS that contain nicotine and by protecting children and adolescents from using these products. FDA also believes that the proposed policy is necessary for other reasons, such as avoiding interference with its regulatory authority, or because there is only a limited scientific understanding of the risks associated with these products. If the proposed ban
