Authored by Ryan McMaken via Mises Institute, The Federal Reserve has just released a new statement on its research into cryptocurrencies, which has, what else, reinforced and explained its position on crypto. By staying the course, as it did with its previous statements on crypto, the Fed has put itself on the record regarding cryptocurrencies, and the line that it takes on the issue is definitely not in the favor of crypto. This is unfortunate, as the Fed recognizes that cryptocurrencies are here to stay and are having an important impact on the financial system, but believes that, in the current state of play in the economy, it can contain or manage any crypto effects without too much collateral damage. It's pretty clear why the Fed says this, and that's because they've seen the damage that befell banks when crypto-assets fell into the hands of speculators and the markets moved against them. As such, they have a desire to keep crypto in check. Crypto's Big and Positive Potential In its latest comments, the Fed has reaffirmed its belief that cryptocurrencies have potential, but reminds the public that cryptocurrency holders are highly unlikely to use their holdings for some bad transactions, like money laundering. It also notes that, as a form of digital money, cryptocurrencies can be a positive force for the economy, noting, "...as part of the payment system, cryptocurrencies can support payments, and potentially lower the transaction costs that might otherwise be associated with the use of alternative payments systems." In a footnote, the Fed also notes
