Roblox is a virtual world that users can program in Lua, a free and open-source programming language. Roblox users can create their own worlds with a wide range of features including buildings, vehicles, weapons, characters, and clothing. Users can also invite their friends to play with their creations. In Roblox, users belong to one of three main groups: hosts, players, or developers. The hosts create the environments for users to explore and play. The players play in the environments that hosts make, and the developers create the environments. Players and developers can earn Robux by using Roblox to play or program. Players can also spend real money to buy Robux, so they can purchase virtual items within the game. Robux Description: Robux are the virtual currency of Roblox and can be used to purchase virtual items with an in-game currency. Unlike many virtual currencies, Robux are not inflated by a governing body but instead are created by the Roblox Server. When a new user registers for Roblox, they are given five Robux, which they can use to purchase virtual items. When a player plays a game, all of their Robux are converted to credits, which allow the player to purchase items from an item shop. The credits balance is displayed next to the player, which can be seen to both players and hosts of the game, and is also updated every ten minutes. Roblox Receives Its Name: Roblox was named after the work of David Baszucki and Erik Cassel. David Baszucki's day job is a web programmer at an online game company, and he and his friend Erik Cassel were making their games for a local Renaissance Faire. The first game they made was called Deathmatch, and it was only 3D graphics, like Doom. David and Erik's first version of Deathmatch had eight weapons. Most of them were very good for one another. The developers didn't even have the concept for a pickup gun, so the player would have to kill an enemy and then pick their gun up.
