The local biosynthetic patterns of ten connective tissue constituents in order to study the effect of tumor necrosis factor alpha (TNFalpha) on the biosynthesis of these substances were investigated. Sixty male Wistar rats were randomized into 12 groups, each consisting of six rats; control group I (0.5% ethanol injection), control group II (saline injection), and TNFalpha-treated groups III-X (intraperitoneal injection of TNFalpha). After a 6-month observation period, the aorta tissue was taken and an oil red O stain performed for detecting the glycosaminoglycan (GAG) and collagens. Paraffin-embedded aorta tissue was stained with hematoxylin-eosin (HE) and immunohistochemically stained for type I and type III collagens, elastin, type III procollagen, fibronectin, and laminin. Fibronectin in the aorta tissue increased significantly after TNFalpha treatment, compared to the other treatment groups. Type III procollagen was significantly increased only in group VIII. Moreover, the levels of type I and III collagens in the aorta tissue of group VIII were significantly increased. No differences in elastin level were observed among the groups. GAG levels decreased significantly in the TNFalpha-treated groups, but no differences were found in the collagen and elastin levels. The local biosynthetic pattern of each connective tissue constituent showed that TNFalpha promoted increased levels of procollagen, fibronectin, and GAG in the aorta tissue. In addition, type I and III collagens increased significantly. Based on these results, it was suggested that TNFalpha might promote vascular sclerosis and help to maintain the chronic inflammatory state.Q: How to split up the last n elements in a list?
