 DNA replication in bacteria is essential for the survival of all bacteria. In Escherichia coli, the activity of the growth-transcription regulator, DnaA, is believed to be regulated indirectly through DNA replication by the bacterial transcription regulator, Crp. A primary mechanism by which DnaA is regulated is via ATP-dependent remodeling of the nucleosome structure, an event important to allow access of DnaA to the replication origin. Recent evidence suggests a new direct mechanism of DnaA regulation through direct binding to the replication origin and through modulation of the nucleosome structure at the Dna 6d1f23a050
