Whew, that's a lot of cool stuff to be excited about as a Windows 8 to Windows 7 transitioner. Windows 8 is a major overhaul, so, let's see what's in store for the world of Windows 7 users. More than the ecology of infection with Hantavirus. Hantavirus is a zoonotic virus, classed in the Bunyaviridae, which are enveloped viruses with a genome segmented into 3 or 4 polycistronic negative-strand RNA segments. Rats are its natural host but Hantavirus also occurs in other species, including some which are either synanthropic or domestic (dogs, cats, horses, mongooses). Infection with Hantavirus causes disease in 2 forms, usually presenting as a febrile illness of either pulmonary or haemorrhagic type. These can occur in both humans and animals, and in each case is associated with a very high mortality rate. Humans can be infected by inhalation of the virus, and in such cases the disease usually presents as acute, often fatal, respiratory disease. In domestic animals, Hantavirus infection usually presents as a mild haemorrhagic fever. To date, Hantavirus infection has only been observed in Australia and South-east Asia. This chapter considers the distribution of the virus in its natural hosts, the roles of domestic animals in virus transmission, infection rates in humans, disease pathogenesis and management, and the possible economic impact of Hantavirus infections. A group of new broad-spectrum Toxoplasma gondii vaccines induced antibody responses in mice that were equivalent to those induced by human anti-Toxoplasma serum therapy, according to a recently published report. Written by Fariborz Mokhtari, MD, PhD, in the online edition of The Journal of Infectious Diseases, a team led by Christoph Burger, PhD, a pathologist and immunologist at the University of Zurich, analyzed three recently developed vaccines in mice. These vaccines had previously been shown to induce high levels of T. gondii-specific T cell immunity, but the animals were still susceptible to lethal T. gondii infection. The investigators injected the mice with the Toxoplasma gondii vaccine candidates at a dose of only 2 parasites per animal—a level that is considerably lower than the dose required to infect mice with virulent parasites. After the animals were challenged with T. 6d1f23a050
