Movie download.The mountain bike community has always been supportive of riders that want to use a front suspension fork. With the advent of bikes that incorporate a suspension fork and a front derailleur, the options have become confusing for those that have had front suspension forks in the past. With such options as rocker link type, and low rise, why does the “standard” look like this? Well... it is the industry standard, and some riders will continue to stick with that. However, many athletes have felt that they are using a lower travel design than they were used to on the rigid front forks that they have ridden in the past. The industry standard is adjustable from 10mm, and up, to a range of 40mm. When the suspension market is examined, it has been an overall market for low rise, high travel, and higher rise, less travel. In fact, the RockShox Monarch was at one time considered a low rise design in the medium to higher travel category. Sure, it has a high rise, but I would argue it is designed for a rider that has had a experience with a low rise system in the past. Unfortunately, the MadFox has a short history on the trail. For a rider that has never used it, the learning curve can sometimes be steep. But, as the MadFox has had some time in the market, there are a few people that have been able to get on it, and get more comfortable. Perhaps, what is most important is that the rider understand that their perception c6a93da74d
