It is intended to be run in a specific, non-web browser. The back button is implemented in the following way: first it checks if the request is in process. If it is the web page simply returns the last URL that was displayed, if not it navigates the user to the main form. if the request is in process the form navigates to the result, sends a request for the result and then navigates back with the result. If the user clicks the back button they'll get an error with the message that the page can't be restored. In a web browser this would be easy. Can I implement this easily in a non-web browser?

A: I am still sure it is simple and each browser can do this different. But in any case you can use the F5 key to perform a new navigation, plus the browser might have some default behaviour which you can overwrite. // RUN: clspv %s -o %t.spv // RUN: spirv-dis %t. c6a93da74d
