T-lymphocyte subsets in scalp hair follicles of two patients with Hodgkin's disease. T cells are known to play an important role in immune reactions to foreign antigens and in the development of autoimmune diseases. The presence of T cells in hair follicles is still poorly documented, even though the stem cells of the hair follicles are known to share many properties with the stem cells of other tissues. In the present study, we evaluated the presence of T-lymphocytes in the scalp hair follicles of two patients with Hodgkin's disease and of two age-matched controls by using a monoclonal antibody against T cells as well as two fluorescence-activated cell sorter (FACS) analyses. A significant number of T cells were found both in the bulge and in the isthmus areas of normal hair follicles. This was true in both control subjects and patients. The percentages of T cells were similar in the control and in the patient group. This supports the idea that the immune system may be involved not only in the incidence of cancer, but also in the steady state and in some autoimmune diseases.
