Although the film is bound to receive a negative review, one must not misconstrue the pro-family nature of the story. The film attempts to encourage people to look at life beyond the perceived boundaries. For a woman, work has always been a means to an end. A woman who is not married can never have a family. It seems like there is no solution to this because her life is just going to be one of busyness. So, what if we make a fun out of life? The film touches a nerve when it tells us that Cheeni is considering this thought process. When Cheeni realizes that her mother has had a change in lifestyle, she sits down to find out what exactly has changed. And, it is exactly this realization that allows Cheeni to then act upon this and reconcile. The fact that Buddhadev is above the character of a typical "more mature man" in NISHABD or that Cheeni Kum is the epitome of a young modern "woman" is what makes the two movies stylistically different. It does, however, carry out a positive message of love and forgiveness. But here the message is carefully planted to create a tinge of tragedy, without the audience being able to detect the same. Also, many of the scenes in NISHABD, or indeed in any film which focuses on relationships between older and younger people, is also laden with symbolism. Take, for instance, when Nina drives Buddhadev to her home for their first date and, in doing so, playfully asks Buddhadev to see out the back window of the car. Buddhadev obliges and instantly understands that Nina holds him in high esteem and that she is confident of herself. Another example comes when Nina questions Buddhadev about his family, and in reply, he brings out an old certificate that declares him to be the son of Kaka Nath, a freedom fighter who was murdered by the British. It is a neat way of simply putting across the fact that Nina does not think of Buddhadev as just an "older man" but rather as a person whose life is as full as she is and that consequently they have a great deal in common.

Unlike what critics have been saying about the film, Cheeni Kum is a complete drama that is slowly developing. This is what makes the film progressive. As the film progresses, we start understanding the darker side of the characters and they start getting more open. When Cheeni and her mother first meet, one particular scene clicks and we understand that each of them has a bond stronger than the other. This contrast becomes more evident in later scenes. For example, before we come to know that Cheeni's mother is harboring guilt, we see her with a smile after receiving a parcel that turns out to be a Valentine's day card. On the other hand, when Cheeni and her mother get into an argument over a domestic matter, it is kind of funny to see the mother suddenly start to cry. And, after this, we understand that she is just hiding the true nature of things. Already, Cheeni Kum has seen almost the entire negative feedback that is piling up on the film on its YouTube channel. The reasons are just basic. From calling the script unnecessary to calling the characterization of the lead female character shallow, critics have pretty much thrown all the red flags at the film. However, what stands out is that it is the filmmakers who are to be blamed for directing a film that is definitely going to receive such critique. Because, a filmmaker cannot hope to change the perception of the script once a critic has come down on the script. Also, contrary to general perception, Cheeni Kum is not similar to RGV's NISHABD. Like NISHABD, CHEENI KUM looks at the relationship between a much older man and a young woman, fit to be his daughter. But, unlike NISHABD, CHEENI KUM stresses on humor to drive home the point. Also, the culmination -- so vital in a film of this genre -- is not difficult to gulp since the sequence of events that lead to the climax are believable. 5ec8ef588b
