making history: the rise of the reich was a new feature for mhii when it launched. the game has long-term goals for germany, and so in this new version, germany has its own government (with its own agenda and primary focus on war), soldiers, and equipment. unfortunately, this also causes its economic output to be far below its potential. but, thanks to a new technology, germany will soon have new, powerful weapons that will greatly change the equation. the game also features the four nations from the original making history, which include the british, the germans, the french and the americans. all players will have to focus on commanding their nations during the next few years, because, while the great war officially ended in 1918, wwi is still going on! in addition to the user-interface of making history, the game features no less than three revamped campaign maps. the three new campaigns are world war i, the great war and the congress of vienna. because the game is based on real-life history and not on imagined history, the interface and the units in the new campaigns are very much the same as those in the original campaigns. so, what was different in the original game? as many wargamers are well aware, strategy games have become a bit more accessible in the past 10 years. and, with that change, making history: the great war became a success on the pc, selling more than 250,000 copies. unfortunately, that success almost made the engine obsolete. in order to finish the game, a new engine had to be written, which took a full year of work. in the mean time, an excellent alternative made its debut. in the fall of 2006, a sequel called making history: the calm and the storm was released. this sequel is completely compatible with the original games, so you can play it either as a standalone title or as a sequel to the original. the game keeps the original interface, but modifies the gameplay slightly.
