After the update, those with a CM-certified device would be forced to download the CM13 Nightlies build, even though they are not "certified" for nightly builds. This could leave those with certain devices at risk, including Samsung and Nexus devices that have CM as their ROM. These devices could either be easily controlled to change settings or wiped, or destroyed by permanently damaging files on the system. It's unknown how malicious this app was meant to be, but the fact that it's mentioned during the first few days of the update is concerning. The app is known for having control over Android's clock and accessibility settings, along with other settings, which is likely the reason the update is mentioned to begin with. This is confirmed, however, by some users who were able to download and install the malware, as well as gain root access. The only app which is mentioned in this update is the the music player, and the mention of the update itself is simply taking the line of "if you haven't updated, you might be infected." There is no way to avoid this part of the update, and if you update, the update itself will be pushed via Google Play so it can be downloaded by anyone who has had the app. CyanogenMod has a notification banner, stating that the update will be pushed to devices, but it has been hard to find that app in the App Store or on Google Play since it was released. The update to the music player is the most concerning, as that seems to be the only mention of the update from the app, which could mean it is the reason it's being pushed. It's possible a large percentage of CyanogenMod users did not realize this was happening, and it's also possible Google Play has cleaned up and removed the problematic music player app from users' phones, but this isn't been confirmed by the company or any users. Google has not responded to our inquiries as of this post. The update did not list what ROM was being used. It does, however, list more builds than ever before, including builds for the great phones of this year and the beautiful Windows 10 devices as well. The update does not come with any of the usual security patches from Google, it does mention updates for the recent patches though. The update already works on all devices, but many will likely roll back right after the app update.
