it was then that hologram technology began to be used as a technique to display products or models. retail stores wishing to show items behind their counters or to sell their products from within their shops had a problem. this was called the "doorway effect" (willis, 1999, p. 31). shelves blocked the view of shoppers or interfered with the flow of the store, even when they were kept at eye level. now, holograms could be used to present such items as a pseudo solid front wall, so that they did not obstruct the view, or to display other interesting products. this could be done even from a position that did not allow the hologram to be viewed directly, but still created the illusion of three dimensions. holograms began to be used to draw attention to products or use them as window displays. they are then able to attract the eye of the viewer, who can then be led into the shop or display the desired products. the business of hologram production rose in the early 1990s, when companies began to market them for use by the public. these included numerous household items, including cutlery, clocks and jewellery (beach, 1997, p. 18; beach, 2001, p. 6), as well as clothing and fashion accessories. these were then followed by footwear, toys and sports equipment. being a girl also means being a great entertainer, as girls' entertainment didn't just make them happy, but satisfied with their own lives. in the 18th century, most girls are most concerned with playing cards and music, as these arts are a simple way to relieve tension and stress, and to engage in more pleasant activities at home, such as embroidering. today, most girls also continue to love to do calligraphy as an art form and decorative art.
