The opportunity to learn has been narrowed down a lot from what it used to be. Schooling now does little but ramp up the expectation that you will have a job or, if you are lucky, an apprenticeship. It is harder to study for your A-levels because of the focus on school leaving and degree qualifications. In the past it was what you could do in the afternoons or evenings, but it is the one thing that almost everyone is expected to do. The new provision for 25 hours of free childcare for two year olds has been criticised for being just that, for younger children. Recent research suggests that nearly half the children getting this free care are not going to formal childcare, and just a small proportion are actually staying with a childminder. In the federal election one Nation senator, Malcolm Roberts, advocated a voucher system to allow parents who could afford to pay to choose a system of childcare that best suited them. The Archbishop of Canterbury has given his backing to a Brexit deal that would allow the U.K. to ditch the European Union single market, customs union and free movement of people. His endorsement ends nine years of grumbling by some conservative Christians who complain that a U.K. outside the EU will erode free speech, challenge Christian values and leave its people open to an influx of extreme Islamic practices. The first big test of the new Prime Minister, after he resigned and was voted in by the Queen, will be the Brexit deal. Either it will be a good Brexit or a bad Brexit. Bad Brexit means the U.K. will stay in the single market and customs union, with free movement of people. Good Brexit means we leave the single market but leave the customs union and don't have free movement of people. In the former case, the European Union will be a vindictive, bullying, competitively closed up shop, with no social concern whatsoever, with Britain scrambling to find a transition agreement for peace. In the latter case, the U.K. can develop a trade deal with the EU and don't have to be treated like some colonial colony.
