update: later versions of windows may contain more data in the zoneinfo file, including the current time zone. so it's definitely worth checking the file's data offset value to make sure it is indeed 0xca45ff27. modern windows will also add additional data related to the time zone that is used on the computer in general. from a forensic perspective, this is a useful data stream to examine. i imagine it will be useful to any attacker on some type of windows system that goes through a forced update or is lacking their software updates settings. be careful trying to query these attributes directly since the file is likely encrypted or possibly fragmented. i would suggest you try decrypting the file first and then use the information to query the local registry and windows settings directly. in other words, you dont want to just grab data from the file system and analyze it on your own; rather, grab it from windows settings and query what you need. the zone.identifier field can have a maximum size of 256 bytes, and is signed to prevent the signed attribute flag being overwritten. if you search the mft entries for zone.identifier, you will find the zone.identifier field, along with the $standard_information attribute; these are the two most common fields in the mft entries that contain $mft information. there are a few other mft attribute names you could use, such as $mft_last_write_time, $mft_used and $mft_all_used. this is also why ntfs does not have a folder or directory structure, as this would result in a directory entry being overwritten by the $mft as the directory would exist somewhere in the mft.
