Another exciting new feature in Photoshop is the new Eraser tool that can be used to quickly and easily remove unwanted areas from a photo. It's also a lot faster at doing this than using the traditional manual erase tool. To quickly and easily erase areas in your image, go to the new Eraser tool in the tools panel and use one of the simple OK options. The OK button has proven to be one of the best shortcuts out of all avenues in this version, and is a key reason why Photoshop Elements 7 for Mac was the Mac Editors Choice Winner. In the legacy version of Photoshop, the selection tool can be used as a brush or an eraser. Most of the time, users have to switch back and forth between these two modes to choose whether they are creating or erasing. In Photoshop for the web, the selection tool is now a sculpting tool. You can use the selection brush to drag an edge to remove areas from a photo, or define the edge outline to use as a brush. Press the CMD key and the selection brush is activated. This is the most powerful selection tool I've ever seen fall into the hands of users. Furthermore, the selection brush also comes equipped with a smart brush that helps you clean up elements like dust, blown-out highlights or blurry areas. You can even use the tool to sculpt a merge from highlights to shadows. To sculpt, get a grip on the selected area with the mouse and let go of the click; you'll get a chiseled edge that you can blast away from the photo. Just as the new selection tool has revolutionized the way people do image editing, the new selection brush in Photoshop Elements features will give you precise control over the selection process. The Brush panel controls features such as Size, Pressure and Time. Those are key planning features for fine tuning how you perform the selection. As you drag across the image with the brush, brush settings such as Hardness and Tolerance change depending on where you're dragging the line. You can also use the Brush tools to go in and out of brush mode. This isn't something you see all the time in regular Photoshop editing, but it makes the whole process much quicker because you can get areas you need selected right away without waiting.
