The present invention relates to a system and method of reinforcing a section of a subterranean zone with a shrinkable composition comprising a propylene polymer containing a reinforcing agent and a thermoplastic polymer. Hydraulic fracturing is a common stimulation practice used to enhance or increase the production of hydrocarbons from a subterranean zone penetrated by a well bore. Hydraulic fracturing is frequently employed in a subterranean zone penetrated by a well bore in which the subterranean zone has low permeability. The fracturing is usually performed to create or enhance one or more pathways, or conductive passages, that allow fluid flow to reach a part of the subterranean formation or zones previously inaccessible because of insufficient formation permeability. Fracturing methods are commonly performed in a well bore that penetrates a formation having a substantially vertical well bore portion and a lateral or horizontal well bore portion. The lateral or horizontal well bore portion extends from a lower portion of the vertical well bore portion to an upper portion of the vertical well bore portion. This well bore configuration often exists in low permeability zones. Hydraulic fracturing
