Conventional high-speed package testing involves either bench testing at or below a predetermined capacity of the package by checking the open or short circuit status of each of the package's pins, or possibly testing the package at a lower speed in a separate test fixture. The testing time is determined by the amount of time required for each test, with each test being performed by sending a signal to each of the package pins to be tested. Once testing is complete, the results of the tests are analyzed and a decision is made as to whether or not to reject the product. In both cases, the time to test each package is the same, regardless of the number of pins on the package, and therefore, the speed of the testing is tied to the package's pin count and not to the speed of the testing apparatus. However, not every integrated circuit device includes a pin count equal to the capacity of the package. For example, a memory device having 8192 bits of storage requires a minimum of 2048 pins, but some devices may include as few as 800 pins and as many as 15,000 pins. Thus, where a conventional bench testing system is used to test such a device, the minimum pin 2edc1e01e8

"It's not even a facsimile, I've got a photograph." "I don't care. It's not worth all that trouble. Get me the next one!" "Yes, I will, I will." He looked up at me. "I have a brother who's a priest. Perhaps I can buy them from him." He continued to say the same things again and again, as if he was trying to prove to himself he really had had an experience. In a few minutes he said he had to go, as he had to meet someone. "A friend," he said. "He has given me a necklace, some wonderful things, made of semiprecious stones. I must get them all, must have them all, must give them to you. I have to go." And so he hurried out of the store and down the street. "Don't worry," I said to the old man, "my brother is a doctor. I'll go to him. He'll know how to treat you." But he was gone. That night I began a long talk with my brother. "Last night," I said, "my friend, the student, said to me that he had visited the home of an old man, a cripple, and there the students were buying trinkets." My brother laughed. "That was probably a front, a mockery. Perhaps," he said, "it was just a student's word for
