After months of dwindling support, Russian President Vladimir Putin pulled the plug on his party, United Russia, in a surprise move yesterday, paving the way for his ally, the Duma speaker Boris Gryzlov, to face a challenging general election. Mr. Putin, who is preparing to run for president himself in March, apparently decided to change the rules of the game, including the rules about alliances, in order to thwart the candidacy of a rival. Mr. Gryzlov, in his support for Mr. Putin, should be able to win. But he will be at a disadvantage in going up against a politician with no party affiliation--Gennady Zyuganov, leader of the Communist Party. This was Mr. Putin's plan all along: to split the opposition. For years, Mr. Zyuganov has been decrying Mr. Putin's political hegemony. He is more than a quasi-Communist-he once, when he was the 79a2804d6b
